Getting Started

It has never been easier to find your ancestors. The millions of family history records, search tools, and resources available in this database have made family history research fun and exciting for millions of people.

If you are new to genealogy research, it is important to begin your family history research by working backwards. It is also vital to keep the information you gather organized and well documented. As you search for previous generations, the details you discover will provide clues to other ancestors' lives and keys to finding the generations that preceded them. Be sure to take thorough notes, like any good detective.

What are you searching for?

Here are some examples of the kinds of vital information you might want to investigate and record:

- Birthplaces and dates
- Schools attended and dates
- Marriage places and dates
- Military service
- Immigration and emigration dates and locations
- Occupation
- Death places and dates

Beginning Your Family Tree

The best place to begin building your tree and storing information is at the Home tab in this database. Click on the Home tab, and the first thing you will see are brief instructions about how to begin a tree. Enter the data about the individual you have chosen to be the first person on the tree, and then click "Start Your Tree." For further information about how to start and build on your tree, see Lesson 2 in the Ancestry help menu.

Searching Ancestry Library Edition

Most searching starts with the Search tab. Several items appear under this tab.

The check box for exact matches is very important and will yield very different results when it is or is not checked.

For further information about searching, see Lesson 3 in the Ancestry help menu.
